The Person

Myths do not make strong disciples. Who is willing to die for a myth? Is not a myth susceptible to a thousand different reinterpretations that enable it to survive together with teachings and ways that completely contradict it? Myths can be squished this way and that as needs and times change. There is a place for myth. Cultural myth has a strengthening effect on culture and community. It permits and strengthens allegiances to nations and peoples and their ideals. It encourages and drives achievement. But would one die for such a myth? Not hardly. People will not die for mere utility.

Christians did (and still do) die for Christ. They died in the thousands over a span of more than 200 years, while Christianity did not fade away and die, but while exploded in numbers. A thing worth dying for was a thing worth believing. It cannot merely be useful. It cannot be a matter of morality. It must be something better and greater that leads men, women, and children to choose to die rather than repudiate it. Christ. This simple fact makes a mockery of the modern theory that the Bible is no more historically factual than Greek mythology or the Bhagavad-Gita. No one dies for a myth. In this the philosopher of the age is doubly wrong. First, he mocks Christianity's contention that it is based in the historical fact of the incarnation, life, death, and resurrection of Christ. He rejects the historical facts because they imply a challenge to his supreme wisdom. Could it be that God is wiser than he? Second, he is willing to believe (and faith it is!) that Christianity is not a historical religion, but a set of interpretive myths about the divine spark in every human or the desire of humans to be more than earthbound creatures bound to die. Christ then becomes the generic answer to the question, "Is That All There Is?" Christ while the answer to all cosmic questions, is not a generic answer. He is a person.

We all know the difference between an answer and a person. Answers are one thing. Persons are another. Christ is a person. Not merely an answer to the cosmic questions. Not a myth giving you clues about the "god within." He is the Son of God, born of the Virgin Mary, who is administering lifesaving triage on dying persons like us.

This is the God-Man the unlearned apostles preached to a hostile world. With Him they conquered where they had no expectation of victory. This is the One whom we have received in our baptism, who feeds us on His body and blood. Him we proclaim. He will triumph. He is not an idea. He is a Person for us. The Person.
